CDC Wants Public Trust But Expands Surveillance

Public health officials are afraid they've lost the public's trust. Of course they have. They lied, they pushed a dangerous shot. They pushed Americans into masks, and shutdown the entire economy. Because of public health tyranny, jobs were lost, people died alone, and life-saving drugs were denied. Hundreds of thousands of people died on their watch. They want what they do not deserve.

Now, despite their claim that they want to gain back the trust of Americans, the CDC is revamping their agency and adding a new office, the Office of Public Health Data, Surveillance, and Technology. They want public health officials "armed with the data they need for critical decision making." Given their history, there's nothing about expanded health surveillance that should engender any level of trust.
