Everyone's Vaccination History in a State Database

Vaccination registries are a building block of a national health data system. They're also key to the development of population-based electronic health records. Once states got the private and public funding to create these systems, these databases could be used to build more comprehensive data-collection systems.

Almost every child that receives a vaccination is recorded in a government database. Some people call these immunization registries, but we call them vaccination registries because they register vaccinations, not immunity. As those who got vaccinated for measles and then got sick know, vaccinations don't guarantee immunity. States began by registering children, but now they register adults too. Opt out if you can.
