California Has Measles Hysteria

Although California repealed the right for parents to refuse vaccines except for medical reasons, legislators now want to overrule doctor's decisions. A proposed bill would allow the state to collect private medical records on exempted children and give the state final say over exemptions—not doctors.

One group, which laughably has “privacy” in its name, supports the bill saying, “just because data is sensitive doesn't mean the government and others shouldn't collect and use it.” Thus, this privacy group doesn't support privacy. Well, here's what California should remember. Measles is considered a mild childhood disease. It's not dangerous. There's no reason to intrude or to mandate the vaccine.
