Consider Health Sharing and Choose Wisely

Take time to understand health sharing. Because if you think health sharing is health insurance and if you complain to the state government when it works differently, officials could try to regulate it out of business, depriving Americans of an affordable option for coverage.

But do be aware of differences in health sharing organizations, which are strictly for people of faith who agree to help cover each other’s medical bills. Unfortunately, some groups are welcoming secular folks and others are using brokers and commissions, making them look like insurers. This could cause problems for health sharing. So, choose wisely. And if you want pricey, state-regulated insurance, don’t choose health sharing.
