Is “Focused Protection” for Covid-19 a Good Idea?

On October 4, experts around the world signed a declaration to end the shutdown for most people. Called the Great Barrington Declaration because it was signed in that Massachusetts town, it discusses concerns about the impacts of “prevailing COVID-19 policies” and recommends “Focused Protection.”

In short, the young would resume normal lives and the vulnerable would be protected until herd immunity is achieved. However, Dr. Michel Accad notes, in an excellent critique, there’s no objective way to establish herd immunity, and vulnerability occurs on a gradient with no clear-cut definitions. He fears the declaration could allow targeted lockdowns to continue. He warns readers that government intervention in the name of public health and the common good always leads to winners and losers.
