State Agencies Release Confidential Covid-19 Data

States are playing fast and loose with private data. Three Wisconsin business groups are suing the administration to stop the release of the names of more than 1,000 businesses with employees that have tested positive for COVID-19.

The information has been extrapolated from employee medical records. The lists will be given to the media. As a reminder, testing positive doesn't even mean you're positive because the PCR test has been used wrongly and the antibody test is notoriously unreliable, and all of them are only good for the moment of the test.

Meanwhile, Minnesota's health department distributed the addresses of all COVID-19 patients to all 911 dispatch centers across the state. The addresses were not limited to the location of the centers. In case it's not clear, your data is never safe in the hands of government.
