Why One Doctor Left His Patients

The electronic health record, the EHR, is causing doctors to leave their patients. Congress forced doctors to buy and use computerized record systems to collect and report patient data to the government.

Dr. Tom Davis, left his 25-year practice and 3000 patients because of the “demands of data entry, the use of that data to direct care”—in other words, outside control of treatment decisions—"and [his] overall uncertainty about how medical data was used.” He believes the data is used for purposes that don’t directly benefit patients.

Perhaps Dr. Davis will join The Wedge, where EHRs are not required and government reporting does not happen. JointheWedge.com
