Will A Computer Decide Your Care?

At a large health information technology conference, artificial intelligence and computer-driven diagnoses and treatment decisions were prominent themes.

The former chairman of Google is thrilled with electronic health records because at last he can get access to the patient data he has always wanted. He supports artificial intelligence for making treatment decisions but said computers make errors that confound technicians.

So he said a doctor should always oversee the computers. But another speaker wants to make it harder for doctors that don’t want to comply with computerized treatment protocols. Will doctors want to oversee computers? And will you accept care from computers?
