Should Auditors Call it Fraud?

Federal auditors say California enrolled 450,000 people in Medicaid who may not have been eligible. Seven hundred thirty-eight million dollars was spent on ineligible people and four hundred sixteen million dollars on people who were potentially ineligible. These enrollees were all in the Obamacare expanded Medicaid program.

Ninety percent of the $1.15 billion in questionable payments involved federal dollars. Caseworker errors and computer deficiencies in verifying eligibility were found. California’s Department of Health Care Services agreed with the auditors. But if you had spent taxpayer dollars so carelessly, wouldn’t they call it fraud?
