Death by a Thousand Clicks

The computer in your doctor’s office is not like the handy smartphone in your pocket. It’s a hindrance to patient care. Hassles include “drop-down menus . . . countless boxes to check and pages to navigate. The screen often freezes. It takes seven clicks to order basic antibiotics, 14 clicks to order stronger ones. It’s death by a thousand clicks,” two doctors write in the Wall Street Journal. And “it’s killing the medical profession.” Two-thirds of their work day is spent tending to digital paperwork instead of patients.

Is this what Democrats wanted when they mandated these systems? Is this what Republicans want when they demand ever-more data reporting through these systems?
