Big Brother Beckons

The Center for Digital Health Innovation argues that “the full potential of health [information technology] will require new focus on people and their data collected outside the walls of the hospital and doctor’s office...” The center wants to focus on uses of this kind of data and interventions that help patients as they are living their lives. Imagine these intrusive data crunchers.

The Center’s leadership says “85 to 90 percent of one’s health status” is explained by social and environmental influences outside the clinical setting. They call it a “comprehensive set of health-related data.” I call it Big Brother.
