No Protection From Political Fallout

Obamacare’s current premium rates are set to rise drastically in 2017, right after the next presidential election. To keep them low before then, Obamacare has a program to cover insurance companies’ losses in the first three years and to pay 80% of insurance claims above $45,000. Neither payment is sufficient so premium prices will rise next year and the next.

But in 2017 when these two bailout payments are done, and when all plans must provide Obamacare’s essential health benefits, prices will spike. More people will go uninsured, causing prices to go higher. By 2024, 40 million people will be uninsured, 10 percent more than today, and there will be no protection from the political fallout.
