What if America Were Poor?

Imagine if America were a poor country. Mission-minded doctors from other countries would come to set up hospitals and clinics. And we’d be glad they came. There would be no 132,000 pages of Medicare regulations to get in the way or mandated use of costly computerized medical records to intrude on physician decisions.

And unused drugs put on trucks to be burned today in the U.S. would never go unused. One nonprofit finds and redistributes these unused medications so they don’t go to waste. If the U.S. were poor, we wouldn’t have such medications available but imagining these scenarios points out just how wasteful, overregulated, and unnecessarily expensive health care has become in America today.
