Event or Prevent-Drive Health Care

Prevention is a fine idea. There are food and behavioral choices we can make, exercises we can do, jobs we can choose or refuse. All of them may determine our health future…or not. Some people smoke until they die and never get lung cancer. But the comment of a cardiologist in The Wall Street Journal is worrisome.

She said, “What we really need in this country, rather than event-driven health care, is prevent-driven health care.” With Obamacare in law, electronic medical records tracking our lives, genomic sequencing in the works and Obama’s Independent Payment Advisory Board deciding what care gets paid for for who, we should all be concerned about where such thinking could lead.
