Doctor Loses License for Refusing EHR

A doctor in New Hampshire who practiced for 49 years and still saw 25 to 30 patients a week was forced to give up her license because she refuses to use an electronic health record – or EHR. She charges only $50 per office visit and treats patients unable to afford insurance or prescriptions.

She told the news media, “I cannot practice medicine because the system practices with electronics.” She also said, “It’s fine if you are with the system. If you are not, you are an enemy of the system.”

“She believes she’s being forced to surrender her license because the current healthcare system values EHR use and computerized medicine over professional judgement,” reports the publication EHR Intelligence.
