Ebola and State Government Health Powers

Ebola has arrived. A man traveling from Liberia was not isolated until two days after he started feeling sick. Four people have been quarantined under Texas state law and a police officer is on guard. The four must allow blood samples and they can have no guests until October 19th. Could this law impact you?

Well, in 2002, Texas passed the State Emergency Health Powers Act as proposed by the federal government. Using the 9/11 crisis, 40 states passed this law allowing health officials to assume control of people, property, communications, health care and more in a public health emergency.
