A professor asked his philosophy students to define quality. They couldn’t do it. So he devoted his book, “Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance,” to that very question. He found out quality is not a thing. It’s an event that can only happen in a relationship between a subject and an object. Thus, it happens between a patient and a doctor and only the two can recognize it and measure it.

But doctors are being forced to report patient data to the government for so-called quality measurement, taking time away from patients, violating privacy and causing the patient-doctor relationship to deteriorate. That’s not quality. So when you see quality statistics on doctors, recognize them as the destructive ruse that they are.
