HHS Action Speak Louder Than Words

Federal health officials say exchange coverage is not government health care but the flexing of their regulatory muscles says otherwise. Last week, The Wall Street Journal said it’s not clear if people with Obamacare coverage will have access to drug discount coupons or cards to pay for high-cost medications.

Drug companies say drug discounts are allowed because federal officials have said exchange plans are not government programs. But the government is encouraging health plans in the exchange to reject patient access to such cost-saving discounts. Federal health officials can claim Obamacare is private insurance, but their controlling actions speak louder than their comforting words.
