Immunization Surveillance Program Approved

The federal government is committed to exam-room surveillance. It has approved a new program that integrates vaccination surveillance and government reporting into electronic health records. It’s called the Immunization Integration Program. Doctors and hospitals can use the program to certify to the federal government that patient information is being sent to state vaccination registries.

The program is expected to increase acceptance of vaccines among patients and caregivers, improve vaccine tracking and vaccination rates, and make reporting requirements less burdensome for health care professionals. It also appears that the program may be used to align government payments to physicians with their conformance with vaccination reporting requirements.
