The F in FDA Does Not Stand for Freedom

On November 22, the Food and Drug Administration shut down a private genetic testing company called 23andMe. Their warning letter charged them with marketing a genetic testing service without FDA approval.

The Wall Street Journal sided with the company saying the agency limits innovation. The agency wrote back saying safety concerns are unknown without FDA review. Two readers wrote too. One told of the FDA’s five year delay in releasing data for a drug his wife needs. Another called the FDA’s decision an example of the nanny state run amok. I say, the “F” in FDA does not stand for freedom.
