Using Health Care to Cut Deficit

As last year was coming to a close, the Congressional Budget Office published a list of 16 health care options to reduce the federal deficit. The first three are all Obamacare-related. Option one is caps on federal Medicaid spending. So much for the states that expanded Medicaid expecting 90% federal funding.

Option 2 adds a public plan to the Exchanges, an idea so controversial it was dropped from the bill before it passed. Option three is elimination of Obamacare exchange premium subsidies for people whose income is more than 300% of poverty guidelines. This means fewer people shielded from the high cost of Obamacare. How feasible are these?
