Environmentalists Use Children's Health to Advance Agenda

The environmentalists are moving into health care under the guise of children's health. Bisphenol A -- or BPA -- is one of their targets. Even though the Environmental Protection Agency says BPA is not a health concern, the Food and Drug Administration acquiesced and banned it in baby bottles in 2012.

A new review of 150 BPA studies finds human exposure too low to worry about. The exposure level is "thousands of times lower than the levels you see in animals that do cause effects." Several international organizations discount any risks to humans. But that won't stop environmentalists who are now trying to prohibit it through state law.

"No Ill Effect Found in Human BPA Exposure," Robert Lee Hotz, The Wall Street Journal, February 16-17, 2013.

"FDA Refusal to Ban BPA Angers Environmentalists," Maggie Fox, National Journal, March 30, 2012.

"H.F. 459." Reps. Atkins, Hortman, Abeler, Hilstrom, Franson, Wagenius, Simon, Brynaert, Hornstein, Morgan, Bernardy, Clark, Laine, Lillie, Dehn, R., Loeffler, Minnesota State Legislature, introduced February 11, 2013.

Presented daily by Twila Brase, President, Citizens' Council for Health Freedom.
