Not Final Till it’s Final

If you thought that Obamacare would slide into the background after the three-day Supreme Court ruling, you were sorely mistaken. The next three months will be full of very public attempts to persuade the justices to swing their vote one way or the other. According to a very informative article put out by the Associated Press, the outcome can change all the way to the end.

For instance Justice Kennedy originally voted to support prayer at graduation and was assigned to write the majority opinion. But in the process, he changed his mind. So rather than writing a majority opinion in support of prayer, the majority opinion came out prohibiting it. Nothing is final until the ruling is actually issued.
