Enrollees Should Always Feel the Pain

Last week, three large insurers testified before Congress that 80 to 90 percent of Obamacare enrollees have paid their first month’s premium. But what about the next month, and the next? One expert worries that the longer people pay their Obamacare premiums, the more they’ll realize they aren’t getting anything for all that money. He wants premiums to be taken automatically from bank accounts so people don’t feel the pain.

No, let them feel the pain. It’s their money. They should always feel the pain. That’s the problem with taxes taken from your paycheck. Because you don’t feel the pain, you don’t squeal as hard as you should when they hike your taxes. We don’t want the same thing to happen when health insurers and government hike your premiums.
