Electronic Med Records Lead to Gov’t Control

Electronic medical records may seem efficient, convenient and very 21st century. But around the country where these computerized systems are being installed by force into hospitals and clinics, there is genuine concern and fear about their impact on patient care.

If you received my weekly eNews last Friday, you read troubling comments made by two specialty physicians who recently wrote about the danger of electronic medical records. This includes the way computerized records have put bureaucrats in charge of physician treatment decisions. I urge you to sign up online for the eNews. I want to help you protect your freedom by making sure you are informed. You cannot fight what you do not know.
