Student Tracking System Uncovered

When you really know what’s going on, the scope of government surveillance is shocking. But all too often the data collection and storage systems are surreptitious. You would think the Fourth Amendment prohibiting government search and seizure of papers homes and personal effects had been repealed. But it’s still in the Constitution.

The latest federal surveillance system to be unearthed is the creation of a longitudinal database on public-school students, including “health-care histories, income information, religious affiliations, voting status and even blood types and homework completion.” That’s just the start. Homeschoolers will be tracked too. The Bill Gates Foundation gave $100 million to create the database.
