National ID System Moving Forward

In 2005, Congress passed the REAL ID Act to create a national ID system. The law required states to create driver’s licenses and ID cards to federal standards, allowing data on individuals to be shared nationwide. Many states refused to comply and half passed laws or resolutions banning compliance.

But Congress continues to fund the project, some state legislatures have backtracked on their opposition and some state agencies are working to comply despite a state ban on implementation. Find out what your state is doing by going to the link in today’s Health Freedom Minute. Then tell your state legislators to take action to stop a national ID tracking system from becoming a reality.
