More Pinocchios Please

In 2008, The Washington Post gave Presidential candidate Barack Obama two Pinocchios for the claim that he would cut health insurance premiums by as much as $2,500 a year by investing in prevention and improving electronic health records. The Post said his claim was based on “very questionable” assumptions. Similar Pinocchios followed.

Last month Obama changed his tune saying, “The average family premium is $1,800 lower today than it would have been” had pre-Obamacare trends continued. Maybe his supporters don’t read the news, where there are many recent reports of premiums rising up to 50 percent for next year. And premiums are expected to skyrocket for 2017. Time to issue more Pinocchios.
