EHRs Are Experiment on Patients

A physician writes: “Technology is so great, so captivating, and so compelling, it has spawned a kind of irrational exuberance which blinds people to the enduring principles and values that really matter.” I’ll add that this is especially true when you consider the $30 billion spent by taxpayers to impose electronic health records that endanger patients and let outsiders intrude.

The doctor warns, “In the race to provide better care at lower cost, we have been assured that data will win by a head and distracted physicians won’t harm anyone in the process. We are collectively gambling billions on this race in which the patients are the guinea pigs, being experimented on without their informed consent.” I couldn’t have said it better.
