What Judges Actually Said

Last week in Halbig vs Burwell the judges ruled against Obama saying, “the principle of legislative supremacy” is of utmost importance; that judges have a duty to “ascertain the meaning of the words of the statute duly enacted through the legislative process” and that this “ensur[es] that policy is made by elected, politically accountable representatives, not by appointed, life-tenured judges.”

But in King vs. Burwell, the judges ruled for Obama saying, “the economic framework supporting the Act would crumble if tax credits were unavailable on federal Exchanges.”

One case supports the rule of law; the other supports the wishes of the President.
