Local Hospital Tracking Your Behavior

Hospitals want to know if you’re drinking, smoking, eating donuts, or having sex, even if you’re not yet their patient. Data companies are helping them build profiles of people in their community. If hospitals can keep you well, they can make more money.

This is because hospitals and doctors that have merged into Obamacare Accountable Care Organizations – or ACOs -- get a lump sum of money to take care of all their patients for the whole year. The fewer people that come in the door, the more money they keep. If too many sick people come, they could run out of money. So don’t be surprised if your local hospital calls you up someday, knows your medical conditions, knows your behaviors, and asks if they can come for a little visit to discuss them with you.
