Google's Chilling DNA Plan

Google’s Baseline Study, “will collect anonymous genetic and molecular information from 175 people—and later thousands more—to create what the company hopes will be the fullest picture of what a healthy human being should be.”

Should be? Who is Google or anyone else to say what a healthy human being should be? How will they and their collaborators use the data? Trying to achieve anyone’s idea of perfection is chilling. But there are privacy issues as well.

The Wall Street Journal says, “the idea that Google would know the structure of thousands of people’s bodies...raises significant issues of privacy and fairness” and warns of possible interference in insurance, job interviews and marriage. Think carefully before you let Google study your DNA.
