EHRs Imposed to Put You Under a Microscope

An executive at Dell who is focused on implementing electronic health records, says it may not be necessary to connect these EHRs into a national medical records system to get the health care system he envisions.

His system would value “health instead of just treating illness.” It would pay doctors for outcomes rather than services given, and it would use “predictive analytics” to determine who’s healthy and who’s going to get sick, and who will be expensive to the health care system. It would also standardize and integrate data on Americans from “claims systems, social media, census data and many other sources.”

Did you realize the electronic health record was imposed so outsiders could use your data to reduce payments to doctors and to put you under a microscope?

“Perhaps we don’t need interoperability as much as we think we do.” Sid Nair, Dell, Healthcare IT News, August 3, 2015.
