Massive Date-Sharing in Obamacare Exchange

If you want to know how intrusive the Obamacare exchange will be, look at Minnesota. The state has just signed a $41 million contract with a company called Maximus to build a state-based health insurance exchange – the federal takeover center. No state law allows it. The federal law can’t force states to do it. But when the legislature refused to pass a law, Minnesota’s governor issued an executive order.

According to the contract, Maximus will be given private data, confidential data, welfare data, medical data, and other non-public data. It will also access health data, chemical health records, protected health information, electronic health records, federal tax information, and “other data.”
