Need a Different ACA Study on Young Adults

A recent study shows 19 to 34 year old young adults have had little change in their health status as a result of Obamacare, even if access to physicals, medication, dentists or doctors improved. There was also no change in the number of individuals who reported receiving a flu shot. So, given this fact, the authors say young adults with chronic conditions should now be studied to get a better sense of the law's impact.

But Obama said the law was to help everyone. The fact is most young people are not sick or injured. Young people are perhaps more impacted by the loss of jobs and hours, and being forced to buy Obamacare-priced coverage to avoid the penalty. Can they even afford the cost of the high copays and deductibles? Perhaps this is the study that should be done.
