Hospitals Tracking Population in Proximity

Seven Connecticut hospitals are working together to build a system to analyze patients so they can get paid the new Obamacare and Medicare way. The federal government plans to provide lump-sum payments for care of the population in proximity to hospitals instead of payment for services given to individual patients.

Thus, hospitals can keep more of the payment if they keep the assigned population healthy. Patients can be assigned to a hospital without notification, but if they receive care outside of the assigned hospital, the assigned hospital may have to pick up the tab for that care. Thus, Obamacare encourages hospital tracking and analysis of people who don’t yet consider themselves a patient of the hospital.
