No Right to Healthcare in Constitution

Today is Constitution Day. Under the Constitution of the United States, majority rule does not trump the individual and states’ rights enshrined in the Constitution, including its 27 Amendments. The Constitution limits the Federal Government and gives all other powers to the states and individuals.

But Congress often ignores these limits on the federal government, such as when it unconstitutionally passed Obamacare. Importantly, there is no right to health care in the Constitution. If there was a right to health care, physicians, nurses and others could be conscripted into service. This would result in fewer people choosing to become doctors or nurses. And thus, a right to health care would soon lead to a shortage of it.

Presented daily by Twila Brase, President, Citizens’ Council for Health Freedom.
