FDA's Inhuman Decision

After nearly five years of denial the FDA is going to let patients access the only drug that treats a lung disease that has no known cure. The drug has been available in Europe and even China. But the FDA has said its effectiveness is ambiguous.

The Wall Street Journal says the denial was not humane. The 40,000 people the disease kills every year could have had better and longer lives.

Now consider Obamacare, which established the Independent Payment Advisory Board (or IPAB) to limit access to care the government deems “ineffective.” If the law is not repealed, expect IPAB to be the FDA on steroids, and all sorts of inhumane treatment to result.
