NIH Francis Collins Has Aggressive Cancer

Former NIH director Francis Collins has an aggressive form of prostate cancer. Five years ago, it was slow-growing and did not require treatment. But now his cancer is very aggressive. Thankfully, it has not yet spread beyond the prostate, so he'll have surgery to remove it.

The day he got his first Covid shot in December 2020, he was on the stage with Fauci and HHS Secretary Azar, but he was the only one who looked nervous. It was noticeable. Was he, a physician-scientist, worried because long-term consequences of the shot weren't yet known? Is his cancer one of the aggressive 'turbo cancers' that some doctors believe is a result of the Covid shot? Let us pray for his complete healing and the end of all turbo cancers. Too many people are dying too early.
