Euthanasia Approved Because She Couldn't Cook

A Canadian woman in her 70s could no longer cook meals for her family, something that she prided herself on. So, she requested to be put to death under Canada's Medical Aid in Dying program, or MAiD. Her request was approved. Thankfully, she received counseling in time to stop the state-approved ending of her life.

Some Canadian doctors are now expressing concern with the ease of getting euthanized. The assisted suicide program began in 2016, but in 2021, Canada's Parliament removed the requirement that death must be foreseeable.

In a country that rations care to the point of death, disability, and insufferable pain, the law requires no counseling or attempt to relieve suffering before approving euthanasia.

“Canada approved woman's euthanasia request because she could no longer cook for her family, as country's leading doctors warn system is far too permissive,” Lauren Acton-Taylor, Daily Mail, Updated October 5, 2026: https://www.dailymail.com/news/article-16183791/canada-approved-woman-euthanasia-cook-doctors-warn.html?ns_mchannel=rss&ns_campaign=1490&ito=social-twitter_mailonline
